The wolf has come to stay...

How can a large predator be successfully integrated into a modern cultivated landscape?

Large predators such as the wolf, lynx or bear are protected by strict species conservation. Since about twenty years, the wolf in particular has once again been spreading in Germany and in other European countries. It often leads to problems when humans and predators encounter each other in the often densely populated European cultivated landscapes. In view of this, can rural human populations successfully coexist with predators?

We would like to discuss these and further questions during the congress. This event aims to contribute to sharing and discussing current experiences from the regions concerning coexistence measures such as flock protection and financial support. At the European level, among others a EU platform was installed, facilitating dialogue between various stakeholders and sharing of best practice examples.

The Representation of the State of Saxony-Anhalt to the European Union and the Ministry of Environment, Agriculture and Energy of the State of Saxony-Anhalt kindly invite you.
